Mar 14, 2020 Best-suited for areas that are landlocked, weather is usually unpredictable, and/or . The manual says it is an app that lets me work on my old computer but.[URL] I've tried multiple CDBurners with Free-to-use/Cloud based software, but all are too slow for the speed at which I need to write discs (or at least the CDBurner I tried was extremely slow). I tried K3b and Brasero, but it always seems to give error messages and stops all halfway through. I'm trying to find software that can create discs for me in the fastest time possible. I find it hard to believe that nobody has built a utility for creating discs on the fly, but am prepared to admit that maybe it does exist. Is there any other software you may know of that meets the following requirements: Must not be a huge amount of data (2 - 4GB discs) and Must be quick and will let you change the disc after the first one (i.e. different name, length, etc.) (You may also know of any software that creates discs at x2 or even x4 speeds). I would prefer not to pay $50 or $100 for software. I only want to pay $10-$30, although I will consider paying more if it is worth it. I'm looking for software that will let me do the following: Create disc with name, length and location of my choosing Create a disc that has the same name as the one I am ripping from but has a different length (to suit the format and intended use). A: I would use a hardware CD writer like the speed BD-writer, especially if it supports multiple drives. Of course the speed can only be limited by the speed of the drives, but at least you would not need to worry about the burning speed. The "BD-Writer 7" (note the uppercase!) for example can burn up to 6 discs per minute (6x 12x 720 MB). The downside is the high price, but considering you only need to burn only one disc, it is probably not that
