Cybersecurity Improvement Act of 2017 is stalled in the Senate, but the measure makes several key changes that could provide greater protections for individuals and businesses dealing with the complexities of data privacy and cybersecurity. The bill, introduced by

Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Texas), could hinder spying, instead of protecting data The proposed legislation would update the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act to include penalties that would apply in cases of unauthorized access of personal information. The bill, introduced by Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Texas), would add an enforcement layer to the CFAA, which has been used by the Department of Justice to prosecute hackers and vandals across the country. Those added charges would include provisions of the bill that target intrusions into a data network by unauthorized or malicious individuals. Such conduct would include computer sabotage, while infiltrating a company's information systems for the purpose of committing a crime would also be prohibited. According to the bill, the penalties would apply to any system that is used to collect, store or process private information. As the draft text of the bill reads, federal law already criminalizes damage or theft of property, but that language was left out of the final version of the bill. McCaul has said that his legislation is a response to the 2016 report from the Cyber Threat Alliance, a group of about 75 companies that produce many of the devices that use data, including servers, routers, printers and cellphones
