Pulmonary vascular disease is manifested by pulmonary arterial hypertension, which can affect patients at any age, and pulmonary veno-occlusive disease, which affects children and young adults. Multiple etiologies of pulmonary vascular disease are encountered, and therapy must be aimed at the underlying pathophysiologic mechanism. This review will address some of the pathophysiologic mechanisms of the pulmonary vascular diseases and will describe strategies for diagnosis and management. During the last year, 2 major studies concerning endothelin antagonists were published in the world medical literature. The first of these, the SERAPHIN Study, a double-blind study of bosentan in patients with idiopathic pulmonary arterial hypertension, demonstrated that treatment with bosentan significantly improved exercise capacity and quality of life. The second, the MAPHASE Study, a double-blind, placebo-controlled, multicenter trial of ambrisentan, a new endothelin receptor antagonist, in patients with pulmonary arterial hypertension associated with chronic thromboembolic pulmonary hypertension, showed no significant beneficial effects of the drug. The SERAPHIN Study also demonstrated that the administration of bosentan was well tolerated.Q: JWT: QueryStrategy vs TagBasedEncoder I am trying to convert an existing set of controller actions from static read access to JWT-based read access. However, I have two choices of which JWT provider to use: the BitBucket JWT library (formerly npm package jsonwebtoken) or the jackson based JWT library (formerly npm package query-strategy). On one hand, the BitBucket library is pretty small (supports only one bit bucket and issue and refresh tokens). It takes care of all the token generation and validation. However, it uses a static table of token policies and does not support custom policies (although one could write something to support the same). On the other hand, the query-strategy is 6a5afdab4c

Greater Toronto's hospitals produce the vast majority of new research, and have research and development priorities that align with the needs of the community. The collective research is the backbone of innovation and is already working for the benefit of Canada and the world. The Community Health Security Fund supports co-operation among the regional research hospitals to develop and share research that can help to build a better country and healthier world. Hospitals and medical researchers work together on life-saving research. They create new medicines to treat diseases, they make discoveries about the body and what is best for us, they monitor how our health changes and they detect diseases before symptoms arise. The work is extraordinary, yet it could have never happened without one simple fact. It's not a given that the health and well-being of patients or society depends on the work being done at hospitals. As a matter of fact, it's the exact opposite. At hospitals, teams of multi-disciplinary physicians, scientists, pharmacists, nurses, physiologists, psychologists, sociologists, economists, patients and community members work together to produce the best possible health outcomes for patients and the society. All these actors are essential to producing world-class health care in Canada. But there is a big difference between the work being done in hospitals and the work being done in academia — namely, research funding. Our health care system gives the fruits of our collective work to very few. Research and development plays a key role in transforming our health care system into one that takes greater account of patient need, health outcomes, the needs of the community and sustainability. Yet, in Canada, over 95% of all R&D is conducted in universities and other research institutions. But community-based health research, often conducted in the private sector, only accounts for around 1% of health R&D in Canada. More than this, the research universities are governed by private donation and the private sector controls the purse. This means that public institutions like
